Food supplement based on Echinacea, promotes the body's natural defenses

DESCRIPTION

Its main ingredient is Echinacea, a plant belonging to the Compositae family with a precise immunobiological action. The immune defenses are stimulated mainly by the increase in the concentration of specific cells responsible for phagocytosis and by the increase in fibroblast levels. Pharmacological studies indicate that Echinacea is capable of increasing resistance to infections by a direct action on the immune cells of the blood, which are subdivided into mononuclear cells and natural killer cells. The first type is responsible for the specific antigen-antibody bond and Echinacea acts by increasing the toxicity of said bond to obtain the destruction of the antigen; in the second case, it increases the concentration of natural killer cells, which recognize and destroy already infected cells, thus avoiding the proliferation of the pathogen due to other infections.

Hargapophytum is used for its analgesic and anti-inflammatory properties. It is an African creeping plant whose secondary roots are used and whose active principles, after a week of dormancy, can give rise to an antiphlogistic action by stopping the production of prostaglandins. Primarily analgesic and disinfectant properties are those of Myrrh, whose resin contains a series of chemical compounds such as sesquiterpenes, ketones and sterols. Its action is broad spectrum and can be used as an oral disinfectant or as an essential oil, due to its antiparasitic action. Recent studies have demonstrated a strong antibacterial action on organisms such as Escherichia coli and Candida Albicans.

Oregano essential oil is mainly used for its decongestant and antibacterial properties. It is used in bronchial conditions with mucous cough, severe colds and nasal congestion. Recent studies have demonstrated a specific bactericidal action against methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus aureus, confirming its role as a strong antibacterial. All respiratory tract infections can find use in its use.

Thyme essential oil is characterised by its balsamic and antiseptic properties, strengthening the immune system against constrictions of the upper respiratory tract. In fact, its active ingredients, filtered by the intestine and eliminated by the pulmonary alveoli, act locally in the bronchi. An antibacterial action has also been demonstrated, especially against certain types of bacteria such as Staphylococci and Streptococci.

Savory essential oil comes from the Satureja Montana plant. Its active ingredients present a spectrum It has a very broad range of actions: in fact, it can act as immunostimulants, since it acts on the adrenal glands, stimulating hormonal release and contrasting asthenia and hypotension; it helps the respiratory system to eliminate viruses and bacteria, proving very effective in the presence of rhinopharyngitis, bronchitis and pneumonia; it also has a choleric and carminative function, stimulating the production of bile and promoting digestion.
