Papaya food supplement, useful for promoting normal digestive function.

DESCRIPTION

Pineapple contains citric and malic acid, vitamins A, B and C, a yeast and a digestive ferment (bromelain) that induces digestion in a few minutes, a thousand times its weight in protein (similar to papain and pepsin); it also contains minerals, in particular iodine, potassium and sulfur. Iodine increases basal metabolism; potassium is a powerful diuretic and useful against water retention; sulfur breaks sulfur bridges, making it useful in obesity, cellulite and gout.

Papain is extracted from papaya, obtained by fermenting the juice content that is strained from the incisions made in its branches and in its immature fruit, a juice that coagulates spontaneously. This digestive ferment is similar to pepsin with the only difference that the former is active both in a neutral environment, as well as in an acidic or slightly alkaline environment, while pepsin is only active in a semi-acid environment. It is useful in dyspepsia, hypochlorhydria, in stomach dilatations, in chronic gastritis and in gastric ulcers.

Boldo-based preparations, traditionally used as choleric and cholagogues, are also used to facilitate digestive functions. The bitter principles contained in Gentian, through the stimulation of taste receptors, cause a reflex increase in gastric secretion and saliva, thus contributing to the stimulation of digestive processes.
