DESCRIPTION

Ginkgo leaves contain a wide variety of phytochemical components, including alkanes, sterols, carotenoids, carbohydrates, flavonoids and terpenoids. However, the compounds that characterize this phytocomplex are terpene lactones, called ginkgolides A, B, C, J, M and the sesquiterpene lactone bilobalide. Ginkgo leaves are indicated in all cases of blood circulation disorders, even painful ones, such as e.g. intermittent claudication.

The ancient Chinese already highly appreciated its value, as it also produces an ideal flow rate in the capillaries. It can be very useful for: sleep disorders in the elderly, lack of blood supply to certain organs, arteriosclerosis throughout the body, cold sensations in the legs and poor concentration, as well as heart rhythm disorders. Finally, ginkgo biloba leaves promote the formation of collateral circulation and suppress ischemic pain (pain due to lack of oxygen).
