DESCRIPTION

Prospera Biotech was born at the end of 2019 in Spain, with the aim of developing cosmetic products for each type of sensitive skin.

The spin-off Prospera Biotech, born from the Miguel Hernández University of Elche, has carried out successful tests of its first formula aimed at reducing the effects of radiation dermatitis in cancer patients, chemotherapy.

Prospera Biotech, a company from the Science Park of the Miguel Hernández University (PCUMH) in Elche, has carried out a successful pilot study to test a formulation that reduces sensory discomfort from chemotherapy associated with radiotherapy in cancer patients. The formulation, called PB07, derives from Oncapsisens® cream, which reinforces the barrier function of the epidermis through neuromodulation. During the study, carried out at the Hospital Universitario de Elche, 100% of the voluntary patients reported feeling relief from discomfort with the application of the cream, without reporting adverse effects.

According to the executive director of Prospera Biotech, Marta García Escolano, radiotherapy is essential in the treatment of cancer, and almost half of the patients receive it at some point. Radiodermatitis, a radiation dermatitis, affects up to 95% of irradiated patients, negatively impacting their quality of life and adherence to treatment. In this context, finding relief for these discomforts is crucial.
